Estepona sits about 81 km from Malaga International Airport and 49 km from Gibraltar. Head east and you hit Marbella; go west, and you're in Caseras or Manilva. Around 67,000 people call Estepona home. The weather? Pretty mild—the average temperature is 17°C, and it gets about 900 mm of rain each year. If you love golf, Estepona's got you covered with eight courses. For upscale stays, there are four five-star hotels dotted across town. The coast stretches 21 km and boasts 13 beaches, four with blue flag status (so, clean and safe). You'll also find a marina split in two: one side buzzes with the daily action of the fishing port, where locals trade fresh catches, while the other is all about modern boats—think sea trips, yachting, and a bit of sporting glamour. Manilva, on the other hand, is 93.5 km west of Malaga Airport and just 37 km from Gibraltar. It's a smaller spot—only around 13,000 people live there—which makes it feel a little more laid-back compared to other Costa del Sol towns. The climate stays steady at 17°C a year, with about 750 mm of rain. Golf fans will find one course in Manilva itself, but if you're willing to drive a bit, there are ten more within 20 km. The coastline here runs for 8 km, offering 8 beaches—one flying the blue flag for its quality.
